RE: Lilla Burt Cummings Tower v. John Goodwin Tower, D.C.
Superior Court, Domestic Relations, No. 1403-86.

Dear [REDACTED]

Enclosed is the original certificate of deponent page to be executed by former Senator John G. Tower, in connection with volume one of his deposition, taken on June 9, 1987.

Would you please have the deponent review your copy of the deposition, and execute the certificate page? If the deponent desires any changes, a separate errata sheet should be prepared, indicating the page and line number of each change, and the reasons for each such change. The original certificate of deponent page and the errata sheet, if any, should be returned promptly to this office, so that we can file the original copy of the deposition, conformed if necessary, with the appropriate Court, agency, or attorney.

Failure to return an executed certificate of deponent page may result in the filing of the deposition without signature.

Finally: please note that submission of an errata sheet should be regarded as a communication with the Court, the ultimate recipient, and that you should serve copies on the lawyers whose names appear below.

Very truly yours,

Recipient counsel:

Associates Say Tower Would Cut Weapons

Views on Spending, Reforms Described

By George C. Wilson
Washington Post Staff Writer

If John G. Tower becomes chief executive officer of the world's biggest military organization, the Defense Department, he would quickly cancel some highly visible weapons, seek to put the agency actively on the side of the Justice Department investigation of procurement fraud and try to negotiate a long-term pact with Congress on defense spending, sources familiar with Tower's views said yesterday.

Although Tower has not yet been named defense secretary, he and his associates are far along in their planning of what must be done during the honeymoon period of the Bush presidency to rebuild a pro-defense constituency in Congress that broke apart in the last years of the Reagan presidency. Caspar W. Weinberger, Reagan's secretary of defense for seven years, kept fighting for annual increases in the Pentagon budget. But in each of the last four years Congress balked at continuing increases in real defense funding.

Tower does not intend to insist on annual increases in the Pentagon budget but instead would offer to hold down military spending for an extended period in exchange for Congress giving the department more flexibility in spending whatever money is appropriated, those who know Tower's thinking say.

In public comments yesterday, President-elect George Bush reiterated his support for Tower, calling him "a friend of mine." He added, "Nothing is going to shake my view" about whether to pick Tower as defense secretary, apparently a reference to questions raised about Tower's personal life, and about his role as a consultant to major defense contractors.

But Bush did not say explicitly that the job would go to Tower, and sources close to the former Texas senator said he had received no firm indication yet that he would be going to the Pentagon. Sources in the Bush transition have said that Tower remains the leading if not the only candidate for the job. However, several Bush advisers have continued to argue that the new president needs a proven manager, perhaps a defense industry executive, to refurbish the Pentagon's image.

If Tower is confirmed for the job, the sources familiar with his views said yesterday, he plans to take charts to Congress early next year showing that more weapons could be bought under a zero-growth budget than under a larger one, provided the Pentagon receives a two-year appropriation instead of continuing the traditional practice of wrangling annually over how much is enough for defense.

President Reagan's farewell defense budget, slated to go to Congress Jan. 9, calls for increasing this year's total of $299.5 billion by 2 percent after allowing for inflation.

Bush has indicated he will settle for zero growth after inflation.

"It's going to be team, team, team," stressed one of Tower's aides who has helped map defense strategy for the next administration. Bush, Secretary of State-designate James A. Baker III, Tower and retired lieutenant general Brent Scowcroft, designated White House national security adviser, would be a highly vocal team seeking to build a new consensus for a strong defense and to head off any attempt in Congress to make deeper cuts in Pentagon spending to reduce the federal deficit.

Tower is actively seeking the defense secretary post and is said to feel "uncomfortable" about being kept in the dark so long about his future. As of yesterday, his associates said, Tower had not been consulted about whom he would want as his deputy at the Pentagon if he does get the job, nor has he demanded that he be allowed to choose his own team.

Tower has told aides that although Bush has not yet formally offered the secretaryship to him, "I don't know who else" could be offered the job. Bush has been talking to a number of aerospace executives as he continues to consider candidates for secretary and deputy secretary. Yesterday Bush met with Donald B. Rice, 49, president of the Rand Corp., a former Pentagon official, who has been mentioned as a candidate for a senior Defense Department position.

While Tower has had to wait for Bush to make and announce his selections, several allegations have been made against him. They range from womanizing to potential conflicts of interest if he becomes defense secretary. Tower has not responded directly to these charges, leaving aides and friends to speak for him. He is known to feel this way about the various allegations:

■ Womanizing and drinking. He admits to being too much of a swinger in his younger years but tells friends he was faithful to his second wife, from whom he was divorced this year, and did not date other women until he was separated. If he drank too much in the past, Tower knows he must be a model of propriety as secretary of defense.

■ Conflicts of interest. Although he registered as a lobbyist in February because he was a consultant to several defense companies, he has told associates that he would recuse himself from any of their programs if he becomes secretary. He is said to consider it unfair to call him unfit for the secretaryship because of his connections with the defense industry when many Bush advisers are calling for an executive from the industry to run the Pentagon.

Tower, who was chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee when he retired from the Senate in 1985, now runs Tower and Associates from a suite in downtown Washington. His defense clients include Martin-Marietta Corp.; Rockwell International Corp.; Textron Inc., and LTV Aerospace and Defense Co. Richard Billmire, a Tower associate, said yesterday that the firm does no lobbying for any foreign company but that Tower is on the board of directors of an American subsidiary of British Aerospace PLC.

In contending he would be tough on his friends in the aerospace industry if he became defense secretary, Tower cites his no-holds-barred chairmanship of the commission that uncovered improprieties in the secret efforts by the Reagan White House to sell arms to Iran and use the money to help the contras in Nicaragua.

Billmire also addressed the issue of accumulated campaign contributions that Tower converted to other purposes. Billmire said that Tower had accumulated $466,000 in campaign funds by January 1985 with the anticipation he would run for reelection. He decided not to run, but did not return the money to contributors. Billmire said Tower did not spend the money on himself. Billmire provided a rundown showing that the money went to other candidates and such authorized purposes as Senate office expenses and a contribution of $100,000 to Southwestern University. Records of the fund show that some of the money was spent for travel and meals and for the salaries of individuals who worked for Tower after he left the Senate.

Tower as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee was known for his staunch support of Pentagon programs. He has told associates that he regrets having played a key role in "front loading" the defense budget when Reagan took office in 1981. He has said the Reagan rearmament program he helped design and push through Congress gave more money to the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps than they could spend wisely.

If he becomes defense secretary, Tower has told friends he will not make that same mistake again but will force the services to link their spending to a coherent strategy and cancel weapons that do not fit it. He has often said that he favors reducing the size of the military services to absorb any major cuts in the defense budget rather than impose across-the-board cuts. The latter course, he contends, is what led to the "hollow Army" of the 1970s—a force that lacked inner strength because of shortages of skilled soldiers and modern weapons.

Tower believes the big money crunch for the Pentagon will start in 1992 when bills fall due for weapons ordered under Reagan but not yet paid for. He has told associates that savings could include withdrawing troops from Europe if the administration can find a way to convince allies that this does not lessen the U.S. commitment to their defense.

RE: JOHN GOODWIN TOWER

Dear Sir:

In connection with a White House request for FBI investigation into the referenced subject's suitability for a Presidential appointment requiring Senate confirmation:

[Redacted] is requested to review closed FEC records, excluding routine campaign financial filings, to determine if there were any allegations against or any derogatory information developed concerning the subject or any of the campaign committees listed below. [Redacted] is requested to contact Investigative Assistant (IA) [Redacted] at telephone number [Redacted] with his response. If [Redacted] is not available please leave a message with her secretary, [Redacted] telephone number [Redacted].

[Redacted] is requested to review pending FEC matters to determine if there are any allegations against or if there has been any derogatory information developed concerning the subject or any of the campaign committees listed below. [Redacted] or [Redacted] are requested to contact IA [Redacted] or her secretary with your response.

If you have no record concerning the subject or no record concerning the committee(s), other than routine financial reports, a telephone response, confirmed by a subsequent letter, would enable us to meet our obligations to the White House at an earlier date.

If you have material which you believe we should review please advise us as soon as possible.

Tower says wife won job on merit

Washington Bureau of The News SEP 24 1981

WASHINGTON — Denying he brought pressure to bear on the Reagan administration in connection with his wife's selection for a $50,000-a-year job, Sen. John Tower said Wednesday he is proud of her selection and of her willingness to sacrifice her own law practice and business interests to enter public service.

Tower elaborated on his denial of a story in Wednesday's editions of The News. The story quoted a source familiar with administration personnel decisions as saying the Texas Republican phoned Lyn Nofziger, President Reagan's top political aide, to ask that his wife, Washington attorney Lilla Cummings Tower, be named to head the Institute of Museum Services, an agency the administration had earlier sought to abolish.

"I have done nothing whatsoever to intervene in the administration's plans to abolish the Institute of Museum Services, nor did I attempt to bring any pressure to bear on the administration's selection process," Tower said. "My wife has been chosen by President Reagan for this position on the basis of her own merits."

Tower said he will continue to support "all domestic spending reductions that have been recommended by the administration," and that he still favors dissolution of the institute though partial funding has been approved for next year.

Mrs. Tower resigns post

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Lilla Cummings Tower, the wife of Sen. John Tower, R-Texas, has resigned her post as director of the Institute for Museum Services, saying she wants to devote her full energies to Tower's upcoming re-election campaign. According to letters released Friday by the White House.

Mrs. Tower, an attorney, was appointed director of the institute in 1981. Her resignation is effective Tuesday.

The appointment of Mrs. Tower to the position created controversy when a source familiar with administration personnel decisions said that Tower had asked the White House to nominate his wife to the $50,000 government job.

Tower strongly denied the charge, saying that his wife won the appointment on merit.

During hearings on proposed budget cuts in April 1981, the administration had proposed re-allocating funds for the agency for 1982 and eliminating the agency by fiscal 1983.

which is part of the Department of Education. Her nomination, which is expected to be sent to Capitol Hill shortly, is subject to Senate confirmation.

Asked whether he had made such a request of the White House, Tower said through an aide, "I did not."

But the source said the idea originated when Tower telephoned Lynn Nofziger, assistant to the president for political affairs, to ask that Mrs.

Tower, an attorney, be nominated for the job.

Nofziger could not be reached for comment.

Budget Director David Stockman, in a thick document on proposed budget cuts released in April, said, "The administration proposes to terminate the Institute of Museum Services."

But the agency was saved when the White House agreed to a reduction in its budget, from $12.9 million to $9.6 million.

The Stockman document said the proposal to eliminate the agency "is part of an overall administration effort to rethink federal support of cultural activities."

"While museums and other repositories of cultural artifacts are important in our society, they have traditionally been the beneficiaries of private philanthropy."

Mrs. Tower has refused all interviews about the nomination until after confirmation hearings.

White House staff members said Tuesday that the nomination would be sent "soon" to the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee for confirmation hearings.

The chief function of the museum service agency is to process about 1,200 museum grant applications annually.
